The STERN VOICE of DUTY

"AW, MOM! AW, DAD! HAVE A heart," pleaded Charlie Holmes. "Ursula! What a name! She sounds like a horse!"

"Your cousin Ursula is a very nice girl," said Mrs. Holmes placidly. "You're going to like her very much."

"I'll hate her!" Charlie answered. "I can't even stand her name! Gosh, why'd you have to invite her here for the weekend and spoil everything? I had my own ideas and they were pretty good!"

"Mother," said Mr. Holmes quietly, "would you mind leaving the room? I'd like to speak to Charles...privately!"

Charlie and his dad waited until Mrs. Holmes left the living room. Then Mr. Holmes spoke. "Charlie," he said gravely, "you're growing up now and it's time you became aware of certain things."

Charlie squirmed uncomfortably. "But, dad!" he protested.

"Listen to me," his father continued. "There are many times when we can't do exactly as we wish. Real grownups are people who have learned to do the necessary things as well as the enjoyable! It's good manners and good sense! I'll leave you alone a while to think it over."

Charlie sat in the living room, all by himself. A great struggle was taking place inside him. On one hand was the terrific weekend he had planned...the ball game with the gang, the meeting at the coke palace afterwards, the juke box dance at Peggy's that night, the skating date at the rink...everything!

On the other hand was this female intruder. This...this...Ursula! Some little-known cousin who had no business interfering with him. And yet, what dad said made a certain amount of sense. It was a problem, all right!

For almost an hour, Charlie wrestled with his conscience. It was a tough decision, but he had to make it...and he did! Walking shyly into mom and dad's room, where they sat waiting, Charlie cleared his throat. "I'll have to call the gang and cancel all the dates," he announced, "on account of Ursula. She's probably an impossible type! But I guess you were right about duty, dad, so bring on my goony cousin Ursula!"

Mom and dad exchanged happy smiles. "Good for you, Charlie!" dad said heartily, pumping his son's hand up and down.

"Why, that must be Ursula now!" mom twittered as the door chimes sounded. "Come on down and say hello!"

Charlie swallowed his resentment and followed his parents to the front door. There stood Ursula...the prettiest, brightest-looking, fluffiest little blonde Charlie had ever seen!

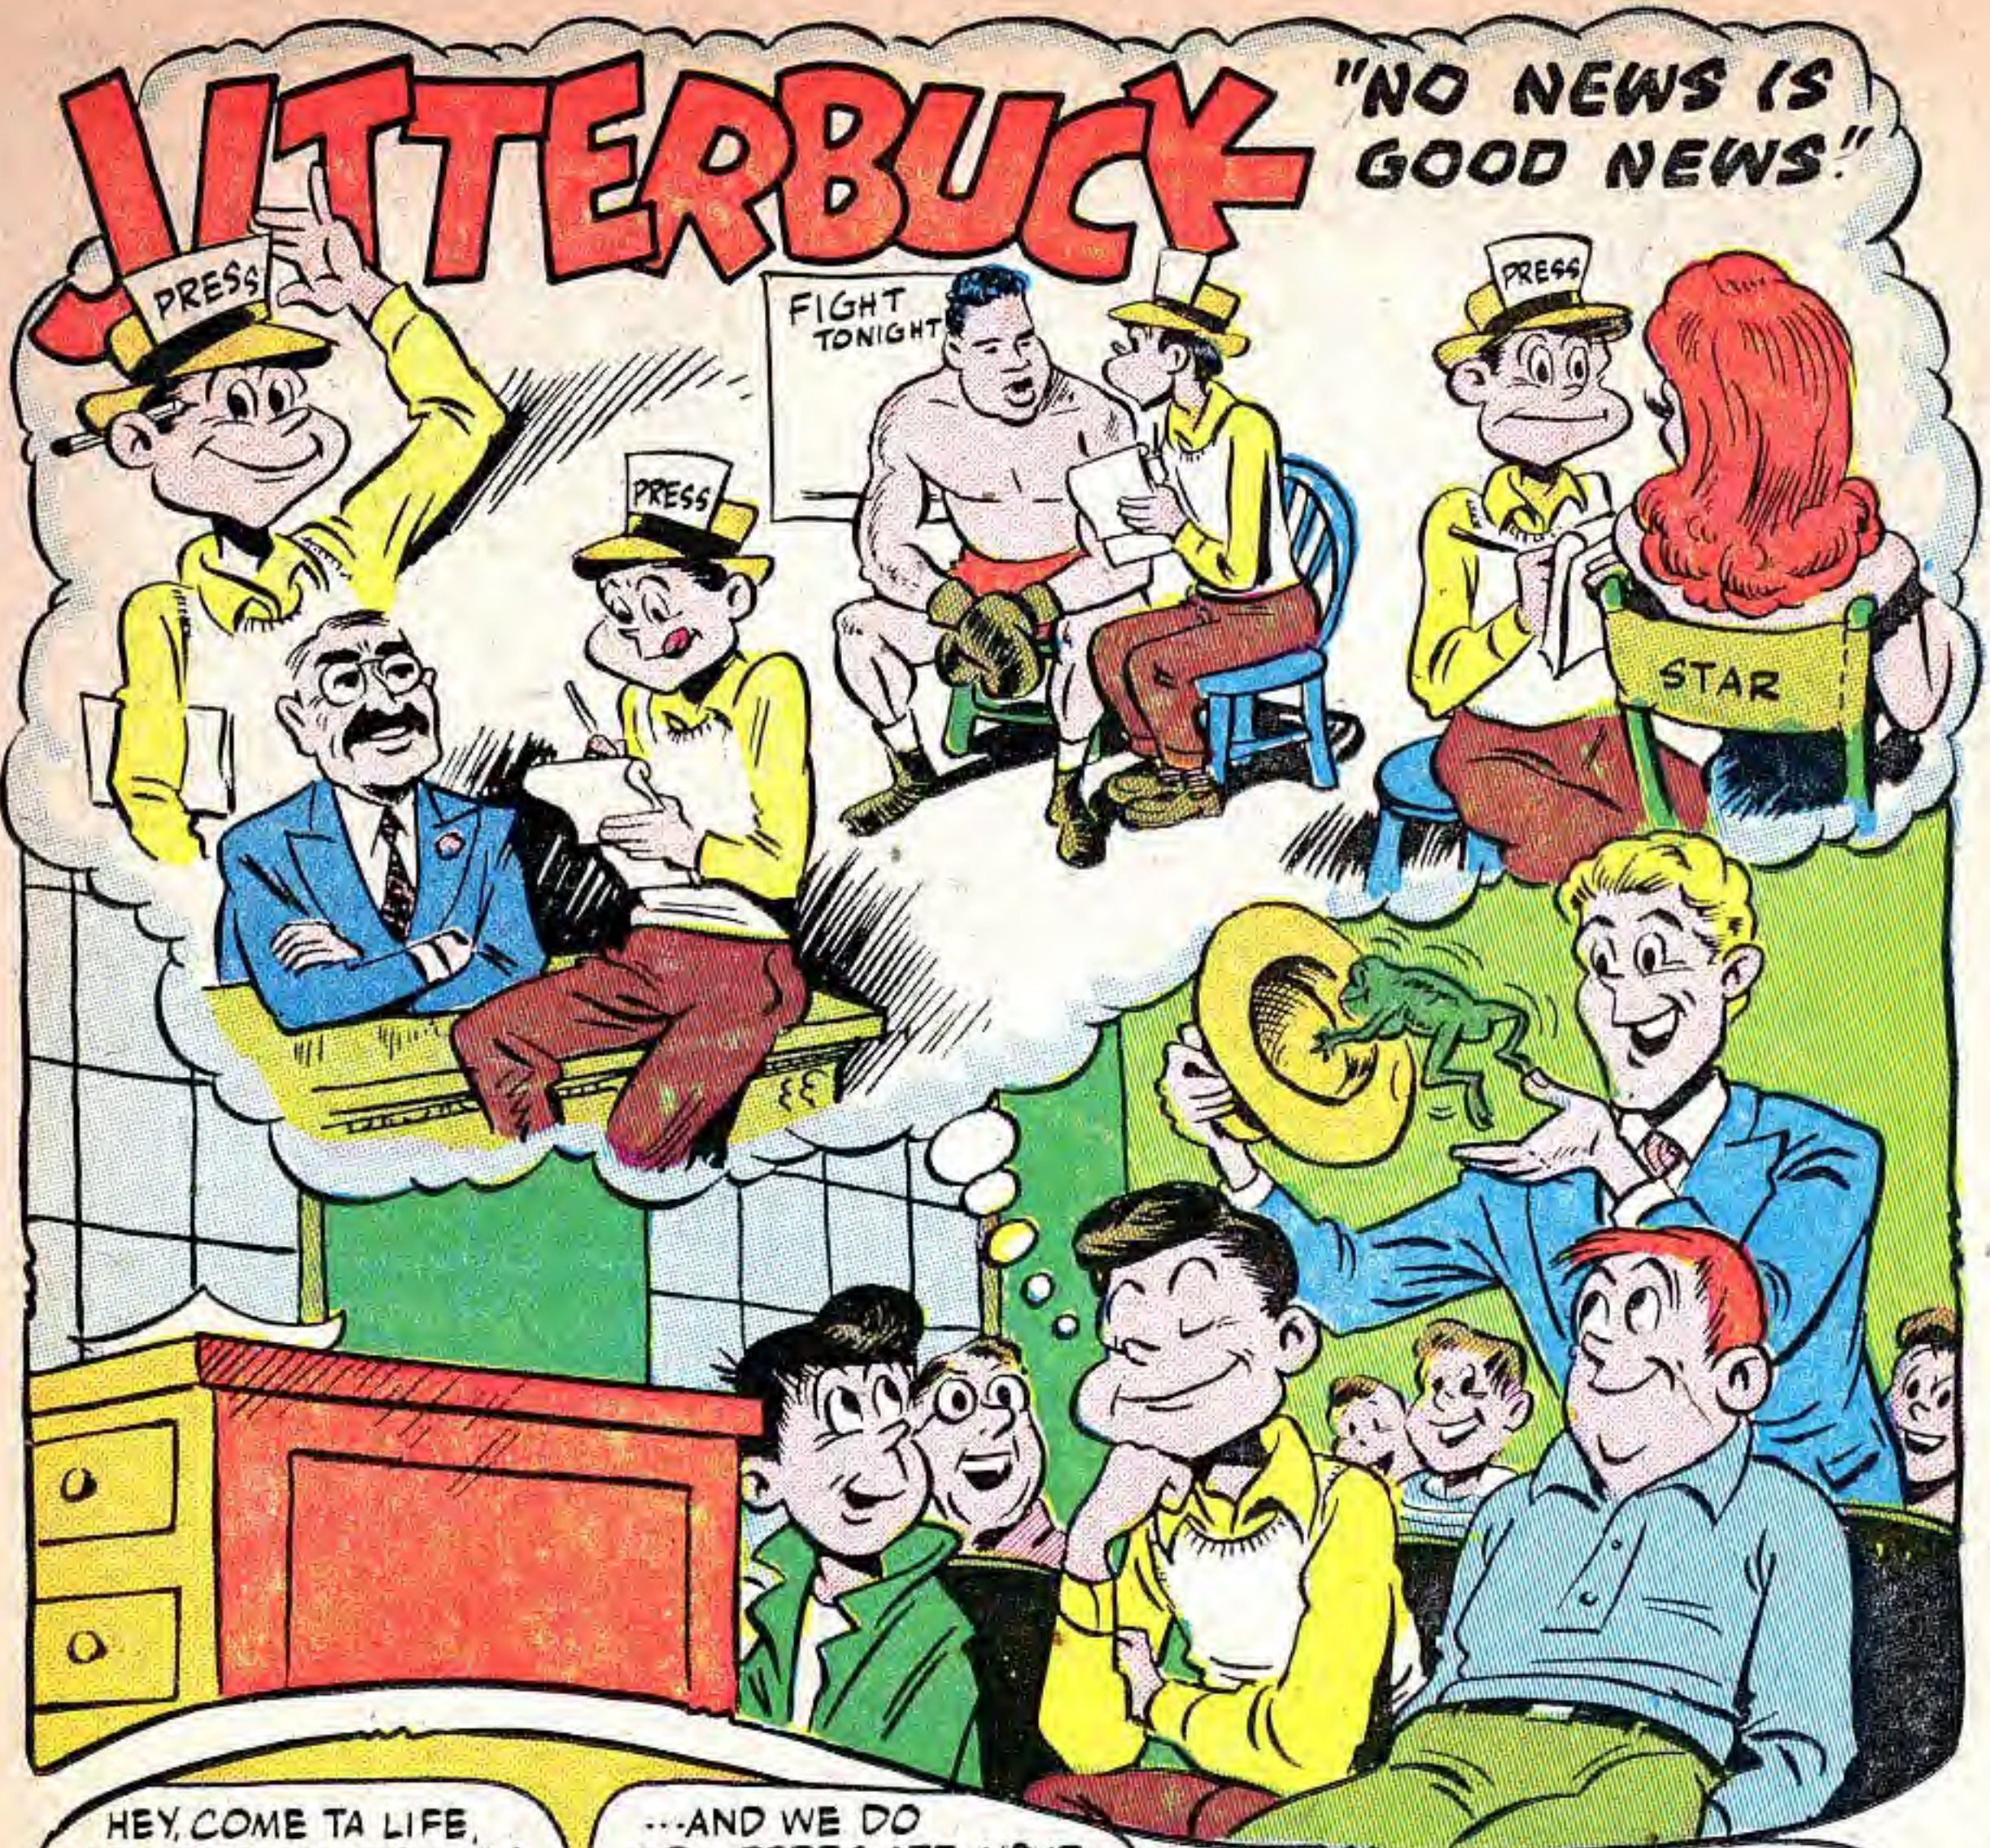

"Hello!" said Charlie, seizing his cousin's suitcase. Then, to Ursula's bewilderment, he added, "Wow!"

As the family took their visitor up to the guest room, Charlie managed to whisper to his dad, "Y'know something, dad? I guess doing one's duty can sometimes be a pleasure! Which this is going to be!"

Then he called to his cousin, "Say, Ursula, if you didn't bring your skates, I know where I can borrow an extra pair. Boy, is this going to be a swell weekend!"

PUBLIC SECRET

THE MOON WAS full and golden, the air was soft and sweet and the park seemed to be a fairyland. "Linny," said Michael tenderly, taking her hand, "I love you!"

"Oh, Michael," sighed Linny, her eyes full of stars. "What a beautiful romance! Just you and I against the world...like Romeo and Juliet! Michael, swear by the beard of your father!"

"Huh?" Michael looked a bit taken aback. "Swear what by what? My pop's got no beard!"

"Oh, don't be icky!" Linny was impatient. "We have such a beautiful love. Let's keep it to ourselves...a private romance! Michael, promise you'll never breathe a word of this to anyone!"

"But...but..." Michael sputtered.

"Promise?" breathed Linny.

"Oh, okay."

When Michael saw Linny home that evening, he went away muttering, "Women! Canya figure 'em out? Not me!"

Linny, however, had other things to do. Dashing to the phone, she dialed Barbara's number. "Hello, Barby? Listen chum, I can't give you all the details now because it's a secret, but I'm practically engaged! Honestly! His initial is "M" and he lives two houses away from me!"

Barbara was thrilled. In fact, she paused only long enough to throw a topper over her shoulders before running across the street to Meg's house.

"Meggy!" she called enthusiastically. "Listen...Linny's engaged! Honestly! To Michael, I guess. She just told me over the phone!" Meg was delirious. In swift succession, she called Ellen, Jean, Claire and Irene.

To each of them she blurted the exciting news.

Not a half-hour later, Linny was putting her hair up in curlers and dreaming happily of her secret romance, when the phone rang.

"Hello? Why, Ellen, what do you mean? Who told you?" Linny felt anger rising in her throat so that she almost choked. "You mean...everybody knows?"

This was too much. A sacred secret bared to the public...by whom? Linny knew there could be only one person responsible for this. Flinging a kerchief over her curlers, she raced out of her house like a little fury.

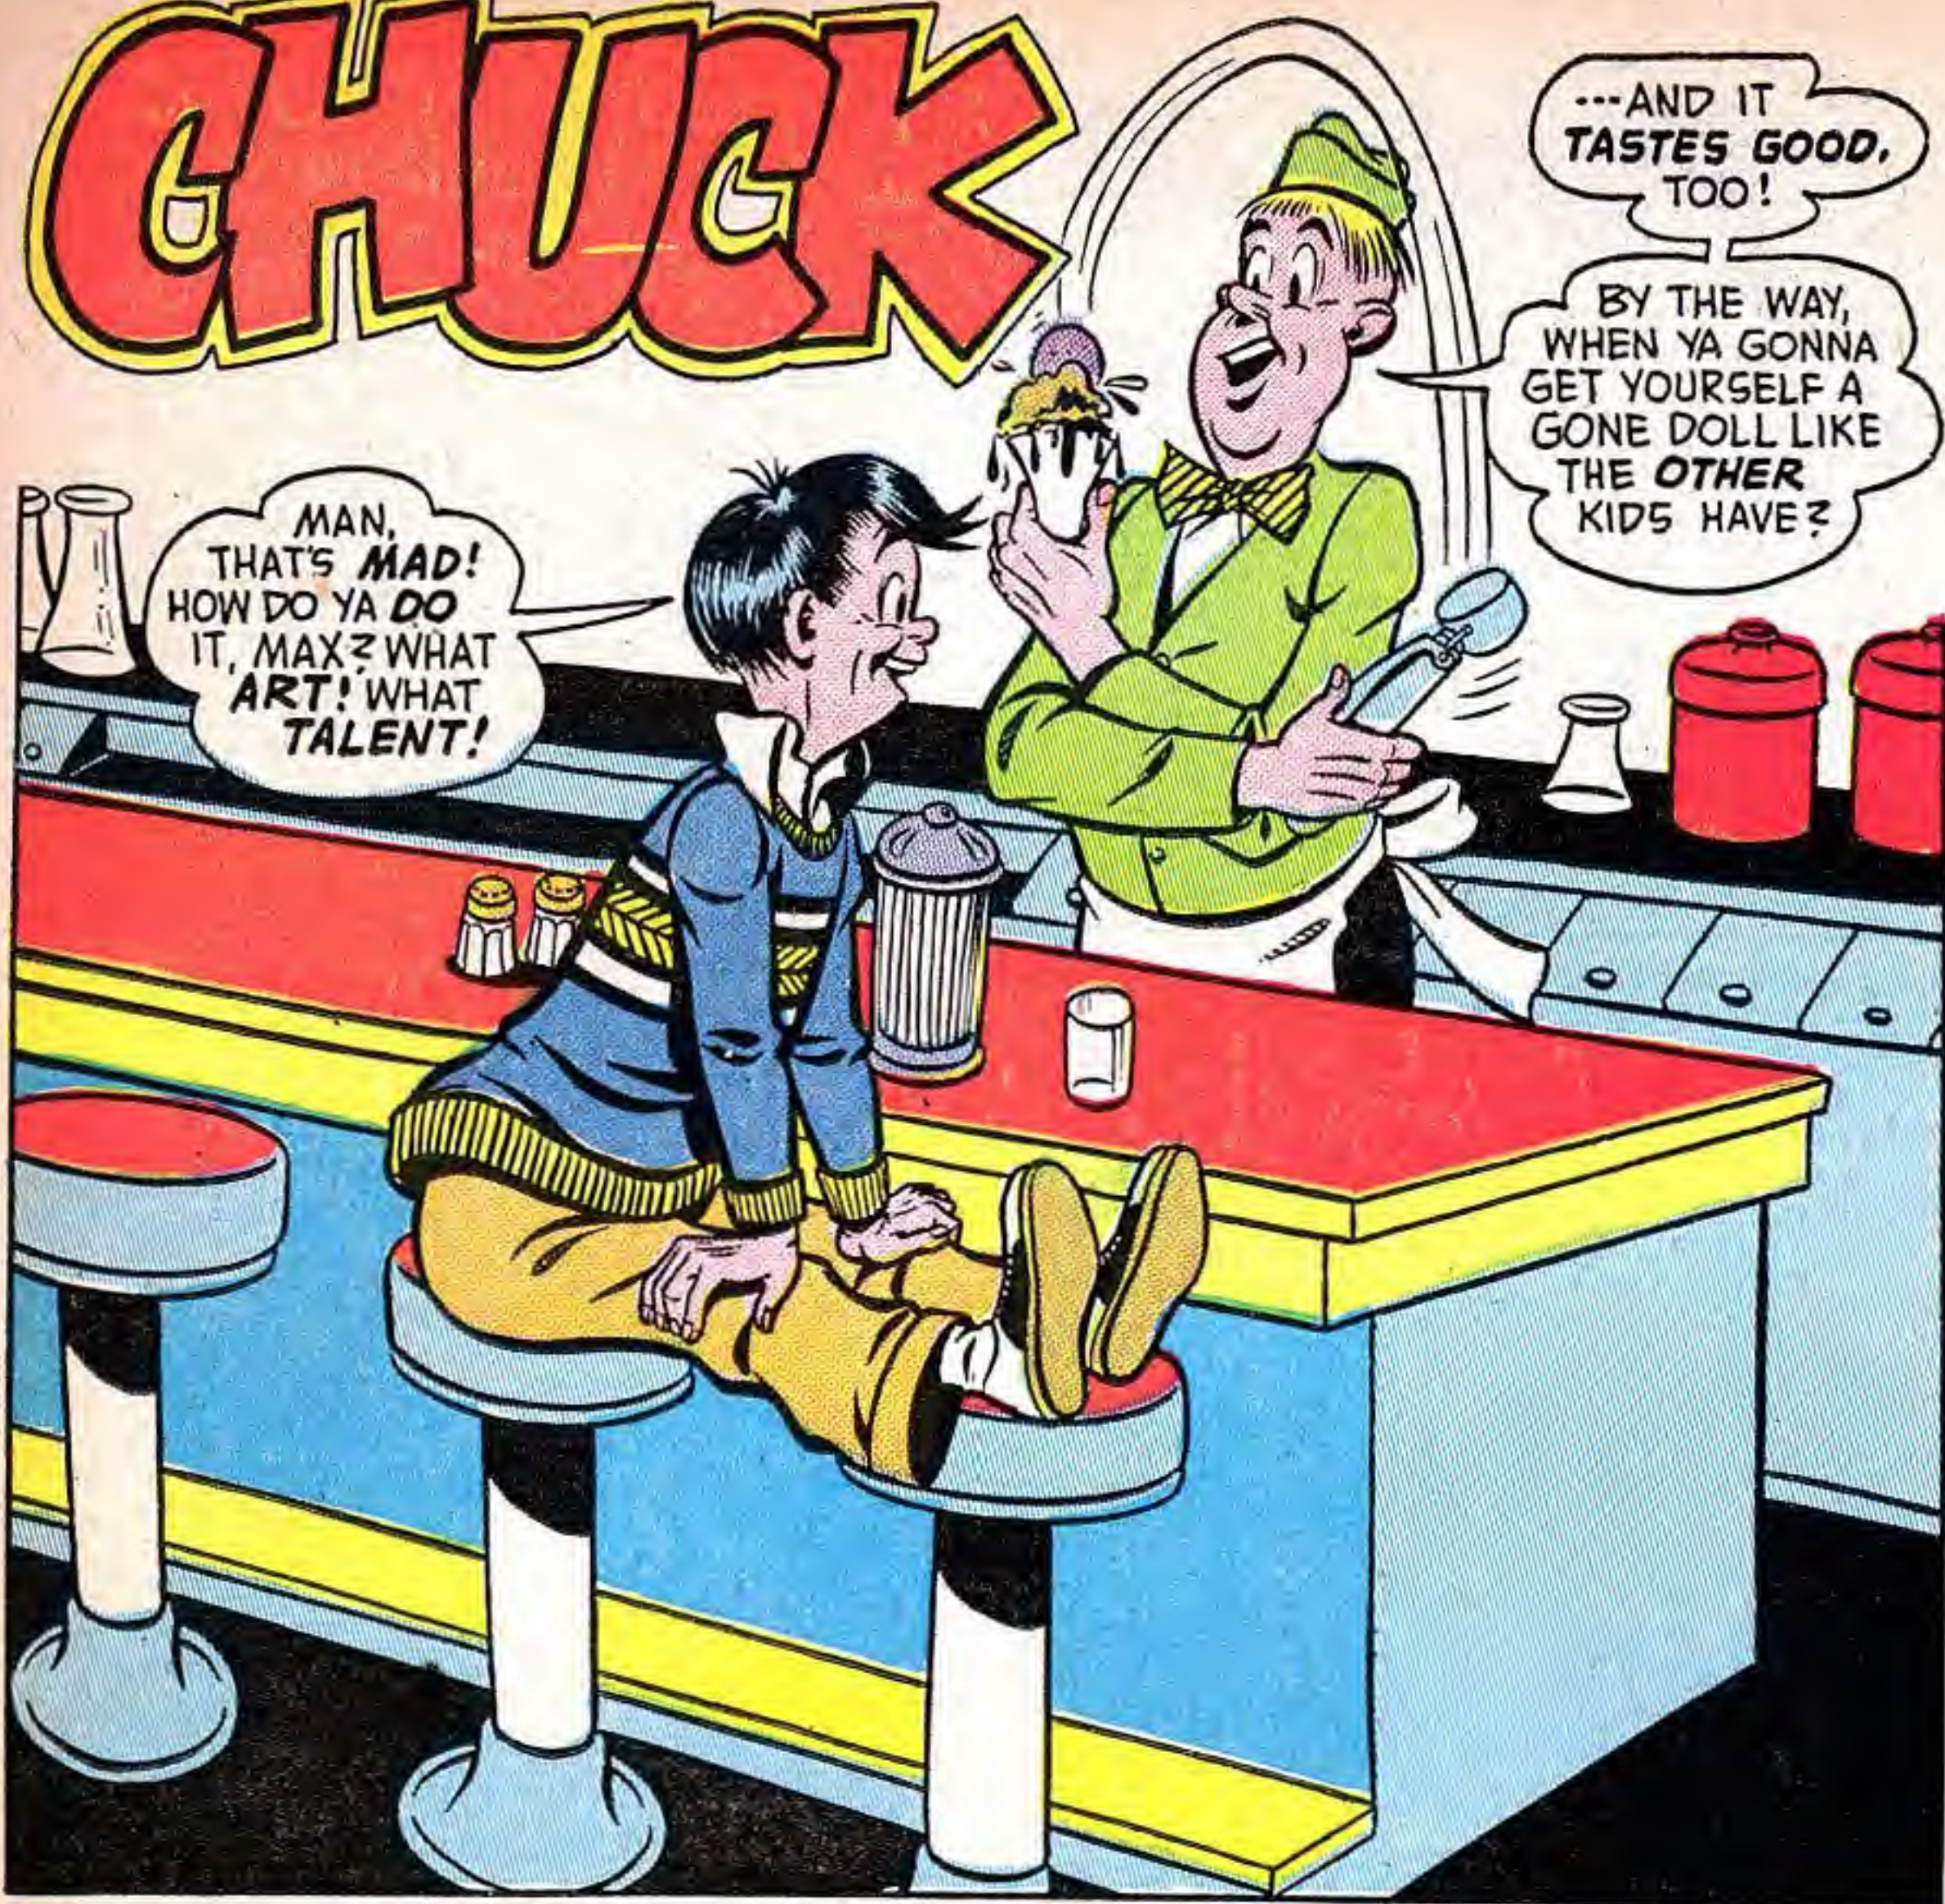

When Michael answered the doorbell, he saw Linny standing on the front porch, panting with rage. "Hello, dreambeam," said Michael cordially. "Your head looks bumpy!"

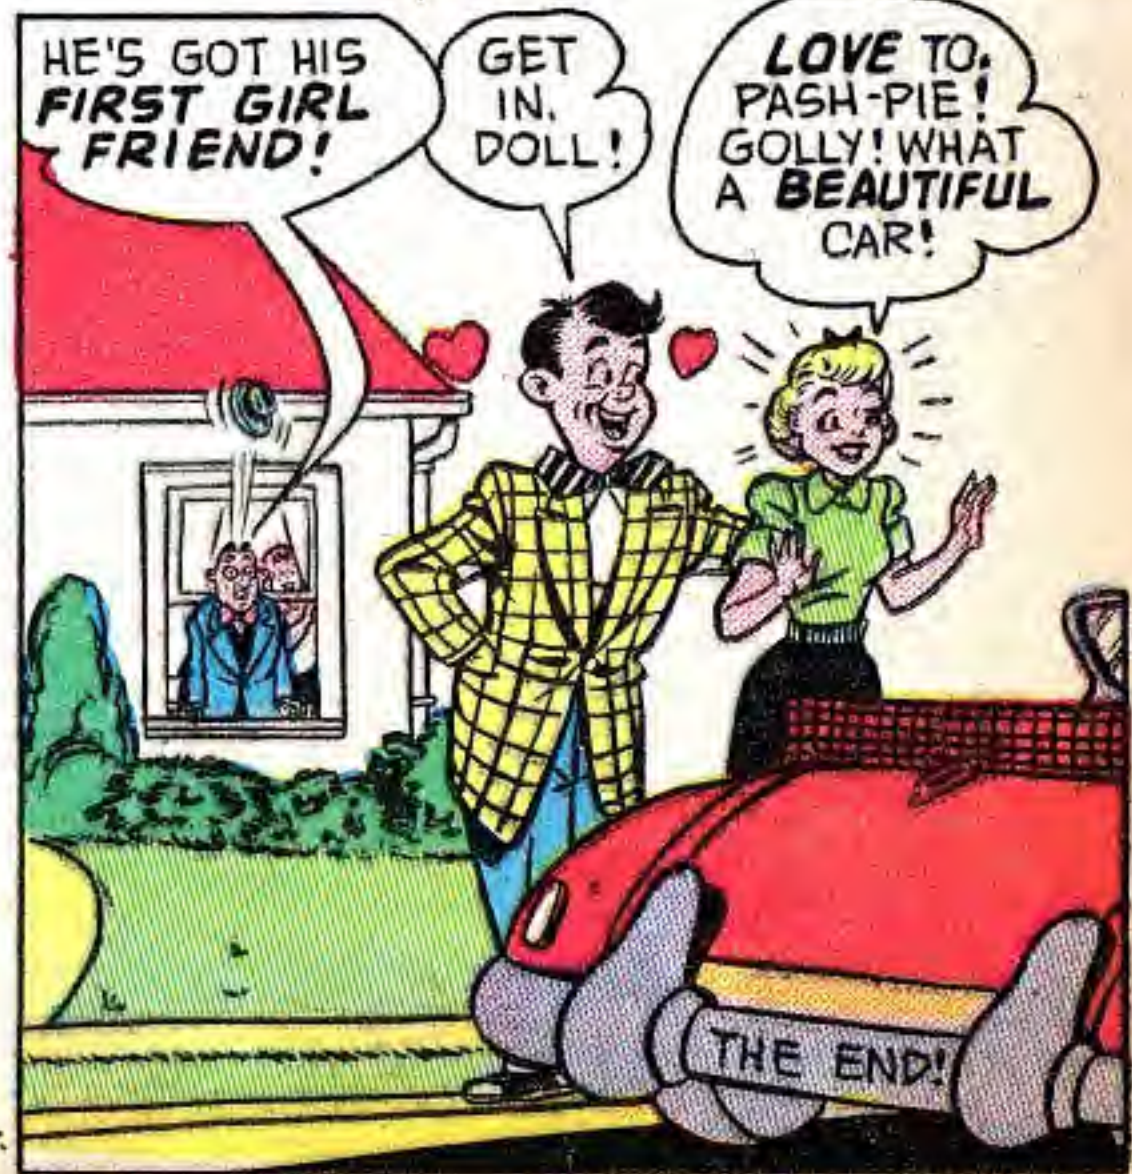

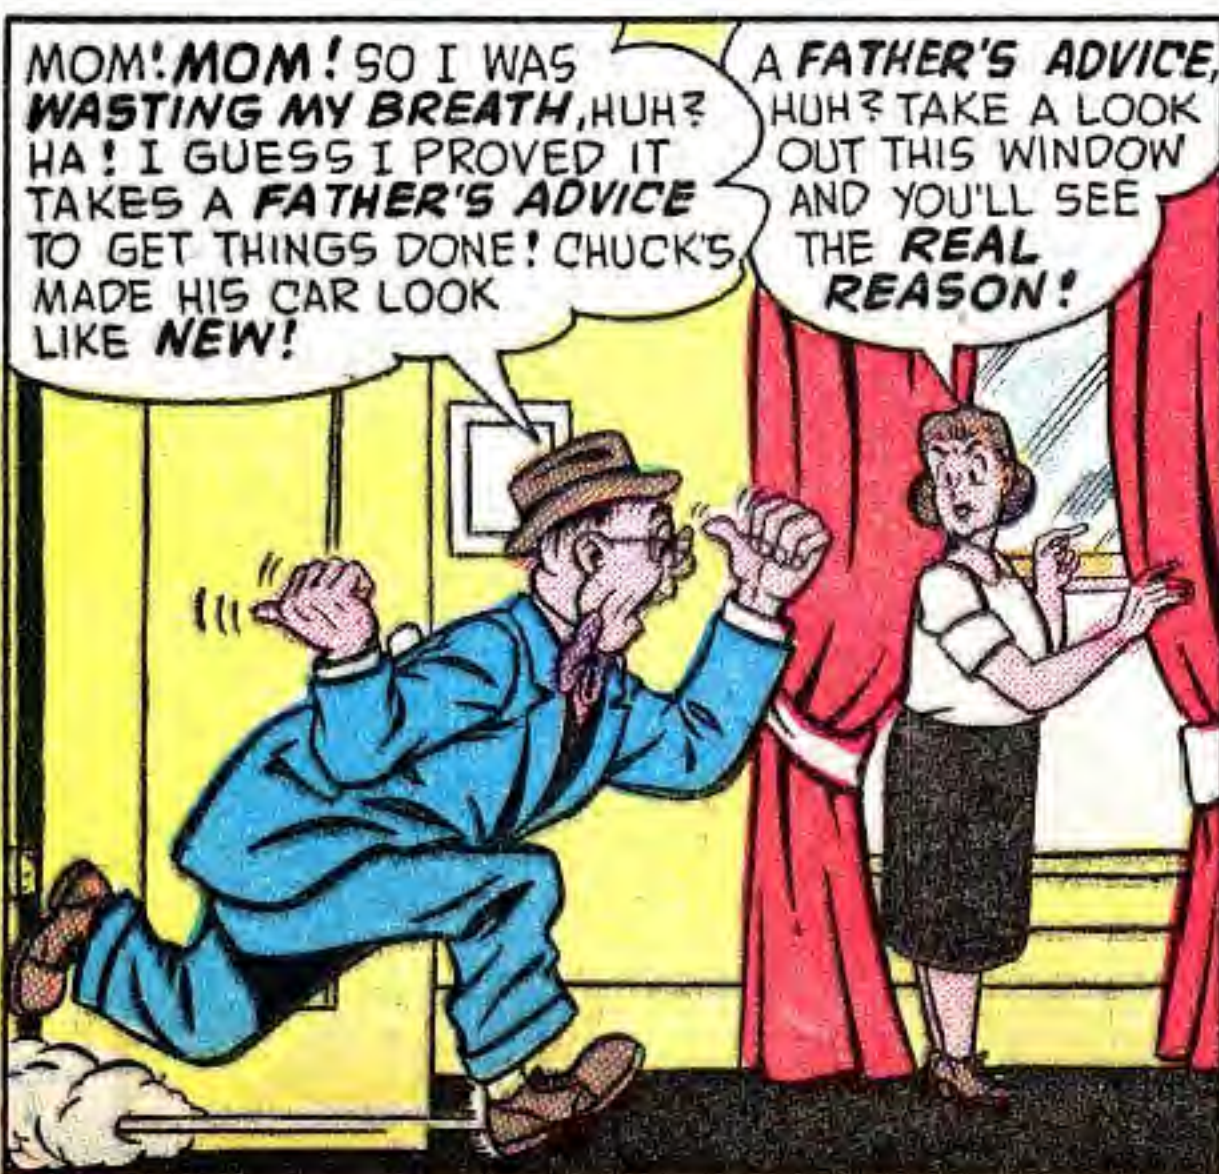

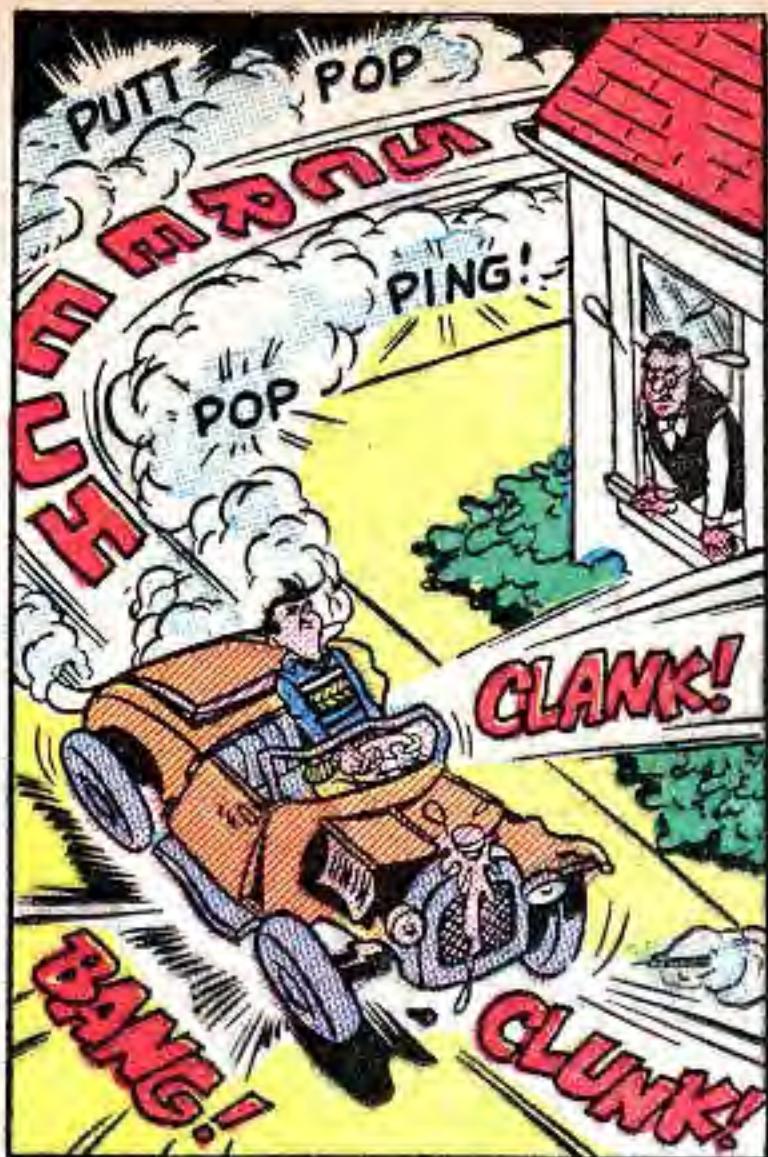

"You...you!" For Linny this was the end. "You're nothing but a traitor! You didn't keep your promise. I...I hate you!"

Michael touched his cheek where Linny had smacked him before she stalked off, crying. "This is goodbye!"

"Like I said before," Michael muttered, his brow wrinkled in puzzlement, "it can't be done! Ya just can't figure women out! At least...not me!"
